This invention relates to an apparatus for transferring an object from a conveyor, e.g., a printing press, to a storage mechanism for storing the object in a secure storage location. Apparatus of the type here concerned are normally employed in connection with apparatus for processing a wide range of materials, including metal sheets, glass sheets, and papers. In such cases, processing apparatuses are provided with an infeed conveyor for transporting the materials to be processed to a processing station where the material is acted upon. After this action the processed material, which may be coated with a non-corrosive top coat, is discharged from the processing apparatus. Typically, the processed material is then stored in a secure storage location. In some cases, the processing apparatus, for example, includes a dust-collecting conveyor for conveying the processed material to the secure storage location. If the processing apparatus includes a dust-collecting conveyor, it is customary to provide a separate transfer conveyor for transferring the processed material from the dust-collecting conveyor to the secure storage location. In this case, it is also customary to use an additional conventional transfer conveyor to transfer the processed material from the dust-collecting conveyor to the processing apparatus. The use of three separate conveyors, and the attendant manipulative steps required to perform the transfer operations, renders these operations a time-consuming and costly process.
